Why Is the Clubhouse App All the Rage?

Have you ever gone to an invitation-only event? The only way you knew about the event is that a colleague or friend told you about it. If you know what this feels like, then this is how the Clubhouse app feels. Here are a few other important things to know about Clubhouse.

- ## Once Your Invited, You Can Join the Group That Invited You and Lots of Other Groups

  This app is not like LinkedIn or Facebook where you set up an account and link to colleagues and friends. With the Clubhouse app, you must get an invite. You don't have to wish for an invite, though. Ask around. Someone you know might be a member and may invite you to their group. Once you're in, you can explore and join one of the many groups on Clubhouse.

- ## You Can Start Your Own Group

  Once you are on Clubhouse, the sky is the limit. You can take part in the group that invited you and other interesting groups you discover. Or you can set up your own group and encourage people to join. But you have to be an active member on the app to establish your own club. If friends are already on the platform, you can invite them to your group. Or you can invite people on your phone contact list to your group.

- ## The Only Catch Is There is No Typing Allowed

  If you are an introvert and only like to type, this app may not be suitable for you. The only acceptable mode of communication is talking.

Do you want to learn more about Clubhouse? To find out more about this sensational new app, click the link: http://rb.gy/falselink/